Opportunity Judicial Clerkship Program's summer externships underway

SANTA FE – Eight law students begin summer externships Tuesday as part of the Opportunity Judicial Clerkship Program, an initiative that provides training, mentorship, and introductions to the judicial process and clerkship opportunities.

The New Mexico Supreme Court with support from the State Bar of New Mexico manage the Opportunity Judicial Clerkship Program, now in its fifth year. The externships last 10 weeks.

"The externs will gain practical experience writing and doing research," said Chief Justice David K. Thomson. "Our staff is ready and willing to assist the externs, and the rest is up to them."

Law clerks within the New Mexico Judiciary typically work for a justice or a judge for one or two years. Law clerks write bench memos, which detail all of the issues within a case objectively, and spend time doing research for writing draft opinions. A written opinion is a formal explanation of a ruling of a case. It is widely acknowledged that judicial clerkships increase professional development of law school graduates and often lead to greater advancement in their career as a lawyer or in the judiciary.

Three different law schools are represented in this year's class. Law students Melissa Anderson, Andrew Gantt, Everett Holmes, Patrick Penso, Alexander James, Kieran Raney, Leola Magallon, and Jackson Faulkner were selected to participate in the Judicial Clerkship Program.
